Rwanda: RPF Patience Growing Thin [ ]

The rebel Tutsi Rwandan Patriotic Front (RPF), increasingly impatient with what it views as Hutu President Habyarimana's manipulation of the 1993 peace accords, is threatening to return to war if progress is not made toward forming a multiethnic coalition government. [ ] after yet another scheduled swearing-in of the new government was scrubbed in late February, senior RPF leaders left Kigali protesting that Habyarimana was instigating violence to disrupt the political transition. Rwandans accused him of being behind the killings in February of a moderate Hutu politician that led to the subsequent revenge murder of a hardline Hutu leader and triggered a resurgence in ethnic violence. [ ] indicate both the government and the RPF violated the cease-fire accords in February, with rebel troops reinforcing positions in the northern demilitarized zone. [ ]

The UN, which has a 2,160-man monitoring mission in Rwanda, has criticized the Rwandans for stalling on ethnic reconciliation. [ ] the UN deployed a battalion of troops for patrols in Kigali and established five-person intervention teams to respond to emergency situations in the capital. In December, the RPF deployed a 600-man contingent to Kigali to guard RPF leaders participating in the multiethnic coalition government. [ ]

A resumption in fighting is likely if the transitional government is further delayed. For now, the RPF may be content with warning the international community of its intentions to force the government's hand. The rebels may opt to continue patrolling the demilitarized zone, for example, in hopes of gaining concessions from the government. Hardline elements in the RPF, however, will probably continue to press for military action. Unless Habyarimana makes concessions to the RPF by engaging them in plans for the installation of the new government and quells accusations that his party is undermining the peace accord, the rebels are likely to resume fighting in the demilitarized zone. UN troops presence in the capital will probably deter the RPF from initiating military action there, but the presence of 600 rebel troops increases the opportunities for renewed fighting between the two sides. 21 February

In Rwanda, the assassination of two ethnic Hutu politicians—a moderate government minister and a supremacist party leader opposed to power sharing—sets off violence that leaves scores dead and further delays and jeopardizes the overdue installation of a transitional Hutu-Tutsi government. Although the arrival of a Ghanaian battalion increases the UN peacekeeping presence to 2,160 troops, the UN Security Council warns that the absence of a transitional government jeopardizes the continuation of the UNAMIR peacekeeping mandate. ☐

28 February

Rwanda's ethnic Tutsi rebels reject the latest proposals for seating a transitional government and national assembly offered by the Hutu-dominated regime, saying they were not consulted about the changes and warning that their patience is running out. ☐
